Participating in the CERVO Scientific Day was a truly enriching experience. I was proud to present, during my very first research presentation, my project on the relationship between age-related hearing loss and cognitive decline. Although I did not yet have results to share, it allowed me to highlight the theories and mechanisms underlying this association, emphasizing what my project investigates : the role of brain structure and psychosocial factors. The event was also an exceptional opportunity to connect with students and researchers working in fields less familiar to me, such as cellular and molecular neuroscience and experimental therapies. These presentations and discussions gave me a broader perspective on the diversity and impact of the research conducted at CERVO. It was a day that was both inspiring and filled with discovery and learning.
